Holds Amount Excessive. The street car company asserts that an excessive amount to require conductors to furnish in change—that the usual rule on street ears in this and other cities is to supply change up to $2, but not more, and court decisions were cited on the argument on instructions to show that this viow had been sustained closewhere. The company also holds that Mr. Bradshaw's refusal to get out of the car when ordered to do so by the conductor, was disorderly conduct, and justified the conductor in making such a charge. The verdict will be of special interest as involving primarily the question of whether conductors may be required to furnish change at all. It has been argued that the furnishing of change in any amount is a mere convenience to the traveling public, and is not primarily the date of the car company or its employes in providing safe transportation. On the other hand if conductors as a colored, and a friend of his were teasing a dop belonging to a little colored of the car. Many Drunks and Some Gamblers Called Up to Answer Charge.
